The Reason Why. Why does Kate look so pale, mother Why are her arms so small ? Why does she never smile, mother? Why do her eye-lids fall?

Why does she walk alone, mother, As if she had no friend? Why does she sigh so oft, mother ? Is she so near her end?

Why does she breathe so quick, mother; And start, as if it shocked her To hear the quiet rap, mother, Of Smith, the village doctor?

Why does he come so oft, mother ? Can he prolong her days By leaving pills and gifts, mother, And singing love-sick lays?

'Twas but the other night, mother. When Kate lay near my heart, She urged me to be good, mother, And said we soon must part. She said she was to go, mother, Away from home and me,

And leave papa and you, mother, To dwell near by the sea. Is it on Jordan's stormy banks, mother. Where she is to be carried?" "Shut up, shut up, you little brat-She's going to be married?"

Scence at Madeld.

There has been a diplomatic fashionable emeute in Madrid, between Mr. Soule, Jr., of the American Legation, and the Duke of Alba, which has thrown the capital into a state of excitement. The Paris correspondent of the London Chronicle, writing on the 27th

Private letters from Madrid speak of an affair which took place in the capital on the fele day of St. Eugenie, and which has not resulted in an affair of honor. It appears that the lady had adopted a costume which is not quite a lade mode de Madrid, in so far that it covered her person up to the throat; whereas the most ap proved fashion among the Madrid damsels is to exhibit as many of the graces conferred upon them by nature as come within the bounds of decency. The remark of the Duke was, "There goes Mary of Burgundy." Mr. Soule on hearing the contemptuous expression, left the lady with whom he was walking, and going up to the Duhe informed him qu'il ctait une canaille, and accompained this piece of information with a-push. Koszta's Statement of his Own Case.

The Hungarian rescued at Smyrna by Captain Ingraham has written a letter to the President, warmly thanking him for the interposition of the American authorities in his case, and giving a narrative of the various circumstances of his imprisonment and escape. He says to the President:

"I have to thank you not only for your support to myself, but also for the principle which you have established, and which will, in future, enforce respect to all those who have the good fortune to be placed under the protection of the American flag. Since a noble people as this, governed by a noble President as yourself, have sanctioned that principle, suffering humanity has ceased fearing oppression and tyranny, and millions of unfortunate, conseious that there exists on this continent a power ever ready to check injustice, mingle their heartfelt vows to mine for the preservation of that power and their worthy ruler. Accept, Mr. President, with my sincere thanks, this hasty narrative of my history, and condescend to continue me your high protection." The narrative presents several details in regard to his capture which have not before appeared. It seems that Commander Schwartz, of the Huzzar, soon after Koszta was taken on board, threatened to punish him with fifty lashes for saying he recognized no right in the Austrian officers to arrest and ill-treat him, as he was under American protection. Schwartz subsequently ordered him to be placed in physical sufferings, he fainted. The next thing he physician of the Huzzar, and medical attendance was administered to him. He continued to be tied to the pillar until 9 A. M., of the next day. About St. Louis. The subsequent proceedings, which " President Pierce is a refined, polished looking resulted in the release of Koszta, are generally gacity and decision. His dress was plain, (simple na was unconditional. The Austrian ambassador insisted that he should not be allowed to return to Turkey, but these terms Koszta refused to accept.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Express says that Koszta has called upon Secretary Marcy, and demanded of the government to return

It is announced by a telegraphic despatch from Vienna that the long-expected reconciliation of the elder and younger branches of the house of Bourbon has been celebrated at Frohsdorf by a formal exchange of visits between the Duke de Nemours and the Duke de Bordeaux; and we presume that the oldest surviving son of Louis Philippe must be held to have acted on this occasion as the representative of the whole branch of the Royal family to which he belongs. Whatever may be the merits of this scheme of fusion, to which more importance has been attached than it really deserves, it is gratifying that Princes so nearly united by blood, and so closely identified by their misfortunes, should have agreed to bury in oblivion differences connected altogether with the history of the past, and to put an end to that division of the Royal family of France which contributed, with other causes, to the total subversion of the monarch. They quarrelled, unhappily for themselves, as long as they had any thing to quarrel about, and nothing but exile and a common fate has now brought them together. But this event terminates that scandalous spectacle of rival parties in the same family, bidding against one another for the national favor, and allowing the divisions of their respective adherents to weaken still further the cause of the Crown. Personally, we have no doubt that the reconciliation is hailed with great satisfaction by both branches of the family; and whatever may be the future destiny of their house, it is seemly that they should meet it or endure it together. The Orleans branch was raised to the throne by one revolution and deposed by another. The interval was a period of unexampled freedom and prosperity to France. But the reign of Louis Philippe, in spite of the great services rendered by that sovereign to his country, created no rights and left few traces behind it. The Orleans Princes had nothing to renounce, and in losing the throne they were restored to their natural position towards the head of their family.-This reconciliation is therefore no more than the resentment which mutual injuries in former times had left behind them. It changes in reality nothing, and
